Extrapolating from Census and state Department of Labor figures, it's reasonable to estimate that New Jersey will gain another million residents in the next 30 years. With just under 1 million acres of developable land left, the state needs to start thinking about where these new residents will go. But if we look at the population trend in New Jersey's urban areas, we can see that more than half of them could be accommodated in our cities without having to disturb a single acre of new land. Read more.

Christie Administration Must Commit to Updating Wastewater Plans

If the Christie administration focuses earnestly on implementing the wastewater rules, the governor can keep his commitment to supporting growth while reducing environmental damage. Read more.

Our Take on the State of the State Address
